<(nur) Kaffee & Kuchen> (just coffee and cake) (2005-06)

This work examines the social and cultural identity constructions of young female migrants in Nuremberg, Germany. Photo cameras were given to a group of young women (aged between 14 and 20) who were asked to take representative pictures of their individual and collective life worlds. With the help of interviews and descriptions of the resulting photos, the young women's views and articulations of "being German" were related to their personal experiences of living in Nuremberg, as well as their broader perceptions of gender and nation(alism) in the migratory context.
